

Continue

Dead man walking full movie

One of the strongest points of The Walking Dead is its incredible clothes. Over the past seven seasons, fans have enjoyed an incredible ride with the good guys and bad guys alike. It's not always easy to root for characters like Rick and Carol, but that's largely because they're complicated. AMC's killer series has also provided a handful of truly awful characters over the years too, though. We don't just talk villains, though many of The Walking Dead's most unlikable men and women often go hunting for Rick and his friends. In this case, TWD's bad apples are also just obnoxious uniform characters. Perhaps they are not fully developed, maybe they make terrible, unforgivable decisions. Whatever the reason, fans often have trouble watching when they appear on screen. Here are the 10 worst characters on The Walking Dead. 10. Father Gabriel Father Gabriel in The Walking Dead | AMC You can give Father Gabriel points to try these days. But then, when you remember his initial decisions, it's hard to forgive and forget. After all, the priest is not necessarily a pinnacle of morality. Despite the fact that he was a man of fabric, many of his choices and actions were completely selfish. Since we never had a chance to see what drove his decision to confess his guilt and try to help Rick and his friends, it's hard to know where he came from these days. Father Gabriel can be an interesting and valuable character if we have a better understanding of what drives him. Instead, he feels like an unstable force, and a force that is hard to care about at all. 9. Lori Grimes Lori Grimes | AMC Lori Grimes, in many ways, was the most hated character in the early years of The Walking Dead. In some sense, hatred is ridiculous - after all, she didn't know Rick was alive when she started sleeping with Shane. And she made the ultimate sacrifice just to give her un born child the opportunity to live. However, most of the decisions Lori made were completely inexcusable. She had an innate inability to lose track of her son, Carl, and did not seem to try particularly hard to handle the complex situation arising between herself, her husband, and her best friend. Lori is the rare character who seems to make things worse every time she participates, which bogged down the film's story. In the end, her tendency to make terrible decisions and then defend lashing out at anyone calling her out makes her extremely unsympathetic. 8. Tomas Tomas | AMC The Walking Dead has a lot of characters, and it's almost impossible for the creators of the series to fully develop it all. However, when it comes to the prisoners that Rick and Co. encountered at the beginning of Season 3, writers have left a lot to be desired. The true leader of the prison group, perhaps the most frustrating of them all. That's largely because his confrontation with Rick is more or less up to him. He's stubborn, stubborn, and unnecessary hatred towards those that more or less give them an opportunity at life. And eventually he got himself and his friends killed, simply because he didn't want to negotiate. 7. Gareth Gareth | AMC The Walking Dead fans have learned that there are many ways to survive a zombie apocalypse, and very few of them involve keeping both your sanity and your humanity completely intact. Of course, when it comes to Gareth and his crew at Terminus, it seems like they didn't even try on that front. Gareth seems like he could be a fascinating, interesting character at first. Unfortunately, he quickly switched to the top villain genre. His cartoonish glee at eating Bob's genus is odd, to say the least. His obsessive need to hunt down Rick and his friends is even stranger, though. Since it is difficult to understand why, precisely, he acted so erratic, it is difficult to really be invested in his character. It was pretty cool to see Rick take him down, though. 6. Andrea Andrea | AMC Fans of The Walking Dead comics were probably delighted when Laurie Holden was cast as Andrea. That's because, in her original incarnation, the lawyer-turned-survivor is one of the most interesting characters the series has ever seen. Unfortunately, that's not the case at all for Andrea's version of AMC. In short, she ended up being the opposite of her comic partner: waffle-y, whiny, and unable to take a stand when it actually counts. She and Shane and the governor are both actively trying to kill their friends and allies. Sometimes, it seems that she has deliberately worked against her own best interests. Andrea's decision made it difficult for her to feel sympathy. But in the end, what really made her one of The Walking Dead's worst characters was how poorly she lived to her potential. 5. Spencer Monroe Walking Dead | AMC Some fans may have felt bad for folks in Alexandria, at least for a short time. When we first met them, they were living an idyllic existence, seemingly immune to the horrors of the apocalypse. Then they had to deal with the harsh reality that he was no longer safe. Some characters, like Aaron, handle that fact better than others. Spencer Monroe, perhaps, handled it worst, though. Yes, he is grieving the loss of his family. But his approach to surviving both zombies around the safe zone and Negan's rage basically comes up to just throwing Rick under the bus. His arrogance was never justified, his efforts to help protect Alexandria almost always backed. In short, Spencer divides his time on The Walking Dead between being a serious problem and being a complete jerk. 4. Gregory Gregory | AMC If any Standard headlines about leadership have emerged in seven seasons of The Walking Dead, which is this: Leadership in the apocalypse isn't all it's cracked up to be. However, some have mastered it better than others. And the one who has done perhaps the worst job at it so far is There are many reasons not to like Hilltop's leadership. His approach to management is fairweather at best. He seemed pleased to let Negan go all over him and his people. He seems to have little respect for women, or anyone who disagrees with him. It bears the question of why he was even a leader in the first place. If fans like to hate a villain like Governor, or even Negan, they may hate having to spend too much time with Gregory on their TV screens. 3. Pete Anderson Pete, Reg and Deanna Monroe | AMC In some ways, Pete Anderson takes a right page out of playbook Ed Pelletier. Except, in his case, he was able to beat his wife and children under his roof in Alexandria, rather than in a roadside tent. There is something more insidious about Pete's method of managing the household. For one, Ed never pretended to be a nice guy - Pete did. But Pete wasn't quite as smooth as he thought he was. And when his efforts in covering up his domestic violence habit blew up in his face, he turned his rage on others. It's sad that poor Reg has to die, and in such a brutal way, just because Pete doesn't like to be taken away from his powers. But it was really a relief when Deanna finally gave Rick the go ahead to just get rid of the guy. 2. Ed Pelletier Ed in The Walking Dead | AMC Here's a comprehensive list of things that Ed Pelletier went for him: a lovely daughter, Sophia; a loving wife, Carol; and a group of men willing to take care of his family. The fact that he abused Carol and Sophia, and was a surly jerk to Rick, Shane and the rest of the group, just makes him that much more awful. Really, as a human being, and a Walking Dead character, he really has no redeeming qualities. It's a credit to the series that they never tried to attract any sympathy for a character as despicable as Ed. Although he lasted only a few episodes, it was a relief to see him go - and the downest treatment to see Carol insult his walker-chomped remains. 1. Negan The Walking Dead's Negan | AMC Can't Deny that Negan is one of the most consequential characters The Walking Dead has ever seen. The series has changed dramatically since he boarded the ship in the final moments of Season 6. His unique brand of potty-mouthed, abusive leadership has changed the way that Rick and his allies live their lives. But just because he matters doesn't mean he wins the reverence the film has for him. Negan's not as smart as he thinks he is. Some fans might argue he isn't nearly as likeable as the creators of the series think he is, either. So far, we've seen a lot of evidence of his bad behavior, but little motivation why. So, although he is truly unforgettable, he is not a well-developed character in any sense. That makes him unique to most other major TWD villains, and not in a good way. In order for Negan to truly join the ranks of great characters, he will need to do more than turn Lucille around and wisecrack. Theo Theo Webb on Twitter @prufox Cheat Sheet Entertainment Check on Facebook! Facebook!

